If you want to see the "Mega-Playboy" ending, than you REALLY should say that you're name is "testbug. " Eeeven though his name is "Junta.".The main purpose of this proposed Phase I SBIR research is to demonstrate a new three dimensional microstructure-based optical method for accurate and non-destructive imaging of submerged or buried objects. The research aims at replacing contact-based systems for imaging of such hidden objects by non-contact methods. The research targets those applications that require high resolution imaging, where air gaps are undesirable. This study specifically targets the region of the spectrum that corresponds to the ~500 nm wavelength (corresponding to a depth of 300-400 micrometers) or so, where ground and water both absorb significantly and the background is effectively zero, allowing the image to be obtained with high contrast. The proposed system is intended to address the shortcomings of two existing non-contact methods: polarization imaging, which is limited to small angles of view, and optical coherence tomography, which is expensive and requires a skilled operator. In contrast, our method would be easy to use with a very small, low cost component - a lenslet array. It would be implemented with existing CMOS cameras. Potential applications include imaging embedded objects (e.g., pipes, cabling, and conduits of buried utility systems) and of buried and submerged objects (e.g., pipelines and tanks of oil and chemical storage). This research demonstrates feasibility of a novel imaging method. Future research would expand the basis of investigations, with the goal of ultimately achieving commercialization. PROPOSED COMMERCIAL APPLICATION: This research will lead to new and accurate non-contact imaging technologies, replacing contact-based approaches. The potential market includes inspection of pipes, water/oil/chemical storage
