Aldehyde bis(acetal) In chemistry, an aldehyde bis(acetal) is a type of acetal that contains one aldehyde functional group (-CHO) and one ketone functional group (or equivalent) (-CO2R). An example is the hydrate adduct (a "formal" acetal) of acetic acid, which is formed by addition of aqueous sodium borohydride to acetic anhydride: Aldehyde bis(acetals) are generally more stable than esters, alcohols, or carbonyls. However, they are less stable than ethers. See also Aldehyde (acetal) References Category:Functional groupsHoward Marks, perhaps the greatest value investor of the past generation, wrote a great little piece for the Stanford Business Quarterly just yesterday, titled, "Create Value When Others Believe It Impossible." The piece is a classic, although not one you'd expect from the man. If you knew better, you'd think it was written by the Dow Chemical Company back in 1958. Or maybe General Electric. Hard to believe that perhaps it really was written by Howard Marks, the man who was instrumental in making the modern value investing movement, but I am not going to waste time arguing the point. The point is, that the article is great. First, it demonstrates that anyone can be a value investor. In fact, the vast majority of value investors are not high net worth individuals, but rather ordinary folks who consider themselves entrepreneurs (and Howard is, after all, a self-described entrepreneur), who are afraid to make mistakes and fearful of losing what they've got, but can't find better alternatives. (If you are willing to live within your means, and not obsess about outside social opportunities, you should be better off than 99% of your fellow citizens, without many other investments to talk about.) And the thing is, if you're in that category, you should be a value investor, because the world you're living in is not a value investing world, and your failure to recognize that has been setting you up for failure. The fourth of the Value Investment Strategies, in fact, is for "those wishing to create their own value and pursue their own path in the world rather than embrace the historical financial wisdom of the

What's New in the?

It's been a while since I've been in an airport. Walking around in the filthy, cramped, and crowded airports of Europe is not the same as strolling down the concourse in the United States. Everywhere I go there are kids in school uniforms, and teenagers in neat clothes with an air of something to be. I'm taken aback by how the results of the election appear to be getting close to the impossible for a majority of people: victory for one side. What is this illness that is gripping so many Americans? Donald Trump could be the next president of the United States. Will he pull it off? After checking in to the hotel, I ask the concierge if the parking garage is safe. He brings me to his office and slides a digital picture of the garage on the table. "This is what it looks like," he says. "You can see that only one vehicle has been stolen from the parking garage." True, I thought, and even though I'm staying in a high-security hotel, I'm still not convinced. I know we're going to have to be vigilant about our valuables, but I'm going to be vigilant about the parking garage too. It's two-in-the-morning when my room service arrives. I'm hungry, but I'm not going to eat, nor do I want to watch television. I grab a bottle of mineral water, read a book I've brought from home, and watch a few episodes of a film. Read more: Can Donald Trump really become the president of the United States? In the morning I pick up my rental car and start the drive to the bar where I'm meeting my roommate's father, the former high school teacher turned restaurant owner. We'll be meeting at the Intercambio, a bar dating back to the 1500s and famous for its tasty tapas. The local heartthrob and model for Dirty Dancing recently bought it, and it's still as charming as ever, with beautiful chandeliers, a marble bar, and a terrace overlooking the ocean. "Do you want to see the highlight of the bar?" one of my friends asks. "The highlight is this patio that overlooks the ocean." He pulls out his phone and shows me a video. It's early May, and the sun is rising on the horizon. The view of the Pacific from the terrace is breathtaking. "There are people even
