Every time a team adopts a Lean process, they are measuring the improvement in their work stream. Lean is all about measuring the output of your work and the time it takes to do it. Unlike traditional manufacturing, Lean is designed to provide immediate feedback to the team and to the process owner. Any type of improvement can be measured by looking at the time it takes to do a task. When that measurement is used for any of the Kanban board available, it helps identify what tasks need to be adjusted. The quality improvement potential of lean comes from measuring the time it takes the team to complete a task. Most times that's a problem, because it takes too long to do a job. Lean events are about reducing that time, the quantity of time it takes a team to complete a task is the most important metric. The less time it takes for a team to perform a task, the more valuable that task is to the company. As a team progresses through the Lean process, it must continually re-evaluate their activities. Each improvement, each change, is trying to find a way to do things faster and easier. The schedule gets shorter and the process owner is looking for ways to reduce the time it takes to complete a task. As a team increases their capacity, they find ways to add value to the process. That's how you measure your progress. Get the Newsletter The Economic Hardship & Financial Stewardship Institute® (EHF) is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization founded in 2011 to serve as a trusted resource for business and policy leaders seeking a greater understanding of the ways economic hardship impacts employees, their families and businesses. Liberal Democrat leader Jo Swinson has pledged to force a general election if her party's proposals are watered down by the Brexit negotiations. Liberal Democrat MP Layla Moran had earlier said the party would not allow its plans to be diluted to prevent a "clear and unequivocal" split from the Conservatives. A "nonsensical" EU referendum has left the country "in limbo", Ms Sw
