Nurses have many roles in patient care, including administering medications and care. But nurses also play a key role in delivering patient care safely and effectively. A 2016 survey of nearly 1,000 nurses found that 92 percent felt that nurses were the most important profession to improve patient safety in hospitals. Sixty-four percent of nurses surveyed said they had spoken up about a patient safety incident they believed should be reported. The good news is that just as nurses can play an important role in improving patient safety, hospital nurses can play a key role in improving their own profession. Part of this involves working in a safe, productive way. But while nurses often focus on patient care, they can also play a role in improving their own professional lives and helping the profession be better. Here are some ways for nurses to have a hand in their own safety: 1. Consider using patient safety training programs. While some individual hospitals have their own programs, the National Patient Safety Foundation has a free online program that hospitals or nurse training programs can use. It includes 1,418 safe care activities that include "7 to 10 simple interventions that can be easily implemented in most clinical settings to help achieve patient-safety goals," according to the foundation's website. The hospital on the CDN's Nursing Podcast, announced on May 21, 2017, that it is implementing Patient Safety 2.0, a database designed to create transparency and share patient
