Nephew killed in fall at store A 23-year-old man is dead after he fell from a warehouse in a popular downtown entertainment district early Monday. Cpl. Tim Austin of the Boston Police Department said the man apparently fell from a platform on the second floor of American Apparel on Summer Street near Scollay Square. The man was later pronounced dead at a hospital, Austin said. In addition to his family, American Apparel owner Dov Charney, 50, who also declined to comment through his lawyer, was among those who saw the incident. "While Dov was saddened by the accident and the tragic loss of life, he is nevertheless relieved the police were able to quickly remove the man from the building," said Charney's lawyer, Charles P. Scibetta. The man fell about 2:30 a.m., Austin said. He was rescued about an hour later, pulled from the building by firefighters, and taken to Mass. General Hospital. A coroner confirmed that the man was the victim of an apparent suicide. His name has not been released. "It is a tragic case," said Boston Public Health Commission spokeswoman Barbara Sampson. Just before 1 a.m., police reported six or seven shots were fired on Summer Street near Bromfield, Austin said. The shots, he said, were fired into the air in a residential neighborhood. In February, Boston police said a brawl among different groups at an Italian restaurant involved a gunshot that fired through a window and hit a woman's hand, but no one was hurt. A spokesman for Suffolk County District Attorney Daniel F. Conley said he did not know whether his office would take the case or whether it would be turned over to state police. Boston police are leading the investigation.
