And within the CSS, when you hover over that image, the image changes to another one that is already in the same directory. I know how to do this with Javascript, but I would like to know if this is possible with pure CSS. Thanks. A: No. If you want this kind of effect in CSS, you'd have to use JavaScript. It might be possible with a CSS only solution if you have multiple images. Using @media queries to only change the styling based on screen size if you have two different images that when clicked would trigger the other image. @media only screen and (max-width: 900px) { #image1 { /* style applied here / } } @media only screen and (min-width: 901px) { #image2 { / style applied here */ } }

Application of a bioenergetic model to evaluate the effect of multiple consecutive days of in utero hypoxia and re-oxygenation (IHR) in a rat model of the fetal growth restriction of the second trimester. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the role of bioenergetic changes and oxidation in the genesis of fetally induced growth restriction. The bioenergetic model was used as a consequence in the experiment. A rat model of fetal growth restriction (FGR) was used. Pregnant rats (9-10 day-pregnant) were divided into three groups: control group, IHR group, and IHR-re-IHR group. Fetuses of IHR and IHR-re-IHR groups were exposed to maternal hypoxia ($FiO_2 = 16\%$) on the 14th day, while fetuses of control group was exposed to normoxia ($FiO_2 = 21\%$) over 3 consecutive days 1cdb36666d

Michael Gove, the education secretary, on Thursday unveiled new plans for independent schools, which will see exams taken by pupils and become a 'standardised test'. Under the proposals, all young people would be required to sit a 'literacy and numeracy test', and then move on to 'key stage' two tests, which would be taken at the age of 13 and 15, and which would then be used to assess the pupils' academic progress. 'Pupils should be able to progress to the next stage as soon as they can show they have the ability to understand the essential skills of reading, writing and maths,' Mr Gove said. Michael Gove, the Education Secretary, unveils his plans to replace GCSEs with a 'standardised test' He added: 'Throughout their education, every child should have the chance to reach their full potential. 'All pupils should be able to graduate from high school with the essential skills they need for life in modern Britain. And all schools should aim to raise standards, and to help children to develop their talents.' But education experts said the proposals are 'completely confusing' and will lead to further controversy over GCSEs. Dr Laura Sandford of the NUT education union said: 'This disastrous new curriculum will lead to more children leaving school with gaps in their education and a really confusing step-by-step system. 'There are not enough reasons to change what is already in place. We need to look at the real barriers to learning and tackle those.' Last year Mr Gove announced that GCSEs would be scrapped and replaced by a new 'series of exams' when the new curriculum is introduced in 2014. At the time he claimed this would allow all children in England to graduate with a 'graded C' for an A*-C grade. But critics claim this would be too general - and not guarantee all pupils would progress to the next level. The plans, which will be detailed in a White Paper, would see all 11 to 14-year-olds sitting a 'literacy and numeracy' test. The
