Few day before it, following problem arose on my hand :E.Q: C# how to get the name of a storyboard without resolving it? In a XAML page, I have a TextBlock with its text property bound to myPage.Items[X].Title. When I write the code behind, I can access this property but not from the InitializeComponent() method (since I need to access it from a window constructor, I need to access it from the constructor that instantiates the window). I looked into the NameScope class, but the only thing I got so far is the name of the XAML page, and not the name of a storyboard. Is there a way to get the name of a storyboard? Thanks. A: If you have an instance of your Window you can use the var name = window.Name; or var name = window.TryGetValue("MyTitle", out var value)? value : "UnknownTitle"; else where you would have the instance of the page. Q: How do I remove double quotes in ruby class variables? I have a rails app and use a few class variables. I want to make them accessible as my_variable, but the double quotes are coming back and I can't figure out how to change them. class Song The song is tagged with song.artist_name and song.title. Any help appreciated! A: To remove double quotes you have to pass a class variable as a Hash. So, change your Song method to def title @title = title.text end
