We are studying the mechanism by which individual motor neurons innervating the phrenic nerve are selected and programmed to generate specific levels of diaphragmatic contractile force in response to different levels of phrenic nerve activity. In the present proposal we will investigate the influence of motor axons on the response of phrenic motoneurons to inputs from other motoneurons. We will also explore the hypothesis that diaphragmatic motoneurons receive different levels of synaptic inputs as a function of the duration and intensity of their phrenic nerve discharge. We will perform extracellular recording of single motoneurons in response to electrical stimulation of the phrenic nerve and the contralateral phrenic nerve as well as inputs from inhibitory interneurons. Inputs from motor axons will be analyzed by paired intracellular recordings and calculation of the conduction latencies. We will study these motoneurons in chronic preparations in which one of the phrenic nerves is sectioned proximal to the hemidiaphragm. Our aims are to determine whether or not motoneurons integrate inputs from several phrenic nerves and whether the information conveyed by the phrenic nerve is heterogeneous; we will also try to determine whether motoneurons receive differential inputs when the same phrenic nerve is inactive. In sum, this proposal will address the question of the relative influence of excitatory and inhibitory synaptic inputs on the determination of the specific pattern of phrenic motoneuron activity.#!/usr/bin/env node var path = require('path'), StringReplace = require('string-replace'), fs = require('fs'), argv = require('minimist')(process.argv.slice(2), 2); var baseUrl = path.join(__dirname, './'); if (process.argv[2] == '-h' || process.argv[2] == '--help') { 05a79cecff
