Large-scale peptide synthesis by solid phase peptide synthesis. Owing to the chemical properties of the reagents used for peptide synthesis and the difficulty of attaining complete anomeric stereochemistry, peptides obtained by solid-phase peptide synthesis have low molecular-weight and amino acid composition. The intent of this communication is to present an overview of these problems, their sources, and the means available for their resolution. The approach presented here is justified by the necessity of cloning proteins and peptides in order to understand their roles in biological systems as well as to develop new drugs, diagnostic reagents, and therapeutic agents. Self-help is a term used when a client is able to deal with their problem independently and should not seek help from mental health professionals (including counselors, psychologists, psychiatrists, or therapists) for their problems. Examples of Self-Help A person might use the term "self-help" when they learn to cope with their problems by going through a course, being placed in a group, or being given access to help material, such as books or Web sites. When a client chooses to use the term "self-help" we are not suggesting that their problems are really simple, because problems are usually more complex than clients imagine. How Self-Help Works Self-help works because people usually have many skills and knowledge that can help them get over their problems. Self-help tends to work because people are motivated to solve problems of their own. Patients may try to do things such as: Locate and use skills from their knowledge base (e.g. "The course I chose taught me how to cope with my problem"). Use self-help materials. Learn how to deal with problems by thinking about them. Self-Help Lesson Plans You can use the idea of self-help to help your students understand how people can solve problems on their own. You can use this approach by asking these questions: What skills and knowledge do people have to help themselves? How does a person learn to use those skills to help themselves? Give students an opportunity to describe how they learn to deal with problems.
