Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an apparatus and a method for determining correctness of a translated text. 2. Background of the Invention During the translation of a text from one language to another, the translator typically looks up equivalent terms and synonyms in a database for a given text. The translator selects the term in the database that yields the most accurate translation of the given text. This process is commonly used for translating written documents that may be found in newspapers and periodicals and as well as for translating computerized text that may be found in electronic documents that are stored in information processing systems and in databases. By way of example, an advertiser may utilize a document translation service to translate advertisement text that was originally written in English to Japanese text. The Japanese text may then be transmitted to a number of Japanese newspapers in an effort to promote sales of the advertiser's product. The Japanese text will be known or identified as such, and the term "translated text" will be used herein to refer to the original text in the English language and the corresponding Japanese text that is the result of the translation. The advertiser has the greatest interest in the translated text if the translated text conveys the same message that was communicated in the original text, such that the advertisement is likely to be effective. The data in the database is related to words and phrases that most likely correspond to each other between the English text and the translated text in a similar fashion that occurs between phrases in a natural language.
