Category: Restaurants in TorontoQ: How to find out the type of an operator Given the following line from a c++ program `score[userID] = (int) (score[userID] + 1) / 2;` The same program also contains the following line `if(score[userID] > 5.0)` or similar. Alternatively, you can use overloads based on the parameter types. You can call the functions `int score(const int)` or `double score(const double)` based on the type of `userID`, depending on your needs. In your particular example, you might be better off just using a single function without any error-checking as your function will always be able to convert `int` to `int`, so anything else will be a failure. A: The standard includes this meta-function: `typename enable_if::value, T>::type round(T v) { return v; }` This can be used to assert for a conversion from an integral type to floating point without always checking the validity of the conversion: `if (score[userID] > 5.0) throw -1; float roundedScore = round(score[userID]); if (roundedScore > 5.0) throw -1;`

Amelogenin expression in postnatal rat growth plate chondrocytes. Amelogenins are extracellular matrix proteins required for enamel formation. Amelogenin gene expression has been shown in the developing tooth. Although several groups have reported amelogenin protein in the developing enamel matrix, its distribution throughout the developing tooth has not been determined. To this end, we examined amelogenin protein localization at various postnatal stages throughout the longitudinal growth plate of rat long
