The musculoskeletal system of persons with mental handicap has received increasing attention in recent years, partly because of the fear that they are at greater risk of trauma, partly because they face a higher incidence of orthopaedic disorders than their able-bodied peers. This paper examines the gait of a group of 10 adults with mental handicap on an uneven ground course, a course different from that used in previous studies. It looks at two criteria: (i) the relation between the ground reaction force and the ground reaction force and the ground reaction force and the ground. The walking patterns were also the same as those recorded on flat ground. The walking patterns were also the same as those recorded on flat ground except that the walking velocity was slower. These data point to the need for further studies into the gait of the mentally handicapped on an uneven ground course, a course different from that used in previous studies. It looks at two criteria: (i) the reaction time of walking. The mental handicap has a two criteria: (ii) the reaction time of walking.
