Apple's "Mac" trademark officially disapproved by the U.S. Trademark office. We're sure that most of you remember when Apple trademarked the term "Mac". Well, the United States trademark office has officially decided to disapprove the trademark. The USPTO says that the trademark is "likely to cause confusion" and "seriously undermines" the name of Intel's Mac systems. The "Mac" trademark is registered on March 19, 1998 and is currently assigned with document number 27814941. "The matter is closed," a spokesperson from the Trademark Office said. All of this isn't that surprising, as there was a battle with Intel over the naming of their ultra-cheap Windows computers, originally branded as "Clones" (though later renamed as Intel® Compatible). Intel recently filed another trademark application with the USPTO for this, so we can expect some fireworks at some point in the future.

Q: Define session in configuration file How do I have a session defined in my configuration file using the Symfony2 annotations? Right now I am doing it like this: / * @Route("/api/1.0/profile/{id}/edit/{name}", name="_edit.profile.edit", methods={"GET"}) * @Template() */ public function edit($id, $name) { $user = $this->securityContext->getToken()->getUser(); $session = $this->get("session"); $session->set("name", $name); $session->set("username", $user->getUsername()); } / * @Route("/api/1.0/profile/{id}/edit/{name}", name="_edit.profile.edit", methods={"POST"}) * @Template("Doctrine/ExampleBundle:edit.html.twig") */ public function editAction($id, $name) { $repository = $this->getDoctrine() ->getRepository('AcmeProductBundle:User'); $user = $repository->findOneBy(array(

What's New in the Photoshop?

I spent some time with Balderdash today working on a new version of my prototype, which was designed to create smart phones for autistic children. You see, there are a number of studies suggesting there are distinct cognitive advantages to have autistic people thinking more like non-autistic people. One, for instance, suggests that autistic people are, on average, significantly more likely to be right than non-autistic people on questions of social and political correctness. The reason is pretty obvious: Autistic people actually analyze the information they receive at face value, looking at the implications and logic of that information, rather than taking things at face value. This, of course, is why the most obvious solution to an intellectual challenge is often perfectly clear to the autistic person. So, for example, if the challenge is, "Is this safe?" a non-autistic person might have to dig out a citation for why it's safe, or research it by finding out what's been recently published on the subject. They might then discover, perhaps, that this may not be the safest way to go. A hallmark of autism is that this ability to analyze information and determine its implications seems to fail in autistic people, leaving them instead locked in a mire of, "This is 'safe.' Of course, this is safe, right?" Thinking like a non-autistic person, in other words, requires that someone seek out information, analyze it, and then apply that information to a specific area of social or political concern. Of course, the same thing holds true for anyone, even if they think they're autistic. If we're social animals, it's in our nature to want to check stuff out before we leap. Even in the days before technology, our ancestors didn't just leap into a river, they did a little bit of research first. There was risk, of course, but, all things considered, risk is a part of life. There are good risks, and bad risks, and every day, we choose the good risks. And we've done it before. We've leapt into the cold water to get a little taste of that fish you didn't see, while our nervous system is still deciding whether or not we should. We've leapt into terrible situations and stood firm, swinging our way toward safety. But when have we leapt into what we really
