He found money in his backyard and made an immense fortune, particularly from video games. It's a rags-to-riches story woven around a very American dream. It's no wonder he loves Silicon Valley. With the help of his family, he's gone on to become a major benefactor in the region — as well as a philanthropist via his "friends of" charity. To many people, in many respects, he's a living legend. But the story of Jannard's rise to internet stardom is an odd one: his rise to his current net worth of over $3.4 billion is more like the rise of a modern day "King Midas." Jannard, at first, gained fame with his video game publishing company, Imagic. In 1978, Imagic launched the tremendously popular Wizardry series of games. He went on to publish other classics that are memorable for being some of the first games of their kind. He also dabbled in other gaming ventures in the 80s and 90s and helped build the ZGames division of Looking Glass Studios, which was founded by friends of his from Imagic. Over time, Jannard got tied up in other projects of his gaming studio Looking Glass Studios. As it was founded by a group of close friends, it was expected that he would eventually sell off his share in the company. It was with high expectations that Jannard started up his new company, Revolution Software, in May of 1993. Jannard and Revolution Software wanted to create a more personal gaming experience. So Revolution Software developed games with strong emotions like The Lost. It was aimed at the same audience as Ultima Underworld and another of Jannard's companies, Origin Systems. So, what happened next?
