Although Latinos have been stereotyped as Latinas, they themselves have identified themselves primarily as Mexican Americans, not Latinos, or Spanish Americans. This article explores the psychological processes and constructs of the Latino American identity. Using a critical race lens, the author argues that the meaning, construction, and significance of the Latino American identity- and its relationship to racism-are rooted in the history of European colonization and the psychology of racial identity. Historical and sociological explanations of Latino Americanness present a three-staged process of cultural subordination. This process of cultural subordination is explained through a review of psychoanalytic and psychological conceptualizations of belonging. The phenomenon of ethnic identity diffusion, which contributes to the Latino American identity, is considered, and linguistic, ethnic, racial, and gender influences are examined. Implications for psychological practice are considered. A dual-winged flame retardant nanohybrid material with core-shell structure: CdSe@TiO₂/Au. We show a facile, high-yield synthesis of the novel two-winged CdSe@TiO₂/Au nanohybrid material. The TiO₂ was readily coated on CdSe quantum dots, and the CdSe@TiO₂ nanocrystals, which possess an additional TiO₂ shell layer, are especially stable, with a relatively high response to visible light. These nanocrystals can be incorporated into a dual-winged nanohybrid material with the assistance of a second cationic species, which can selectively conjugate with the negatively charged TiO_2 surface; furthermore, the nanohybrid material can be easily collected by simple centrifugal sedimentation. As a result, the material exhibits two novel functionalities of photocatalytic antibacterial activity and photothermal-induced drug delivery.
