TUESDAY, DEC. 20, 2011 Food safety is a vital public health issue, and the Massachusetts legislature has authorized a new $1 million national grant to conduct research on the consequences of climate change on food safety. The Massachusetts Sea Grant College Program (MSGCP) is one of five state programs to receive the grants, which were awarded by the National Sea Grant College, Oceanography, National Center for Coastal Ocean Science (NCCOS). The grants target research projects in the areas of water quality, wild food and food safety. "The impact of climate change on the ecosystem must be considered in the context of the adverse health impacts it presents," said Janet Ellis, a professor at the University of New Hampshire and acting program director for MSGCP. The program funded three research proposals in response to the federal Climate and Clean Air Coalition of America -- issued in 2009 -- that identified climate change as a risk to food safety. "The key elements of the proposals included the potential for
