The clinical and neurophysiological patterns of non-inflammatory polyneuropathy (NIP) are highly variable. The diagnosis of NIP is still debated and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is reported as a useful and non-invasive technique to assess NIP neuropathology. The purpose of this study was to define the value of MRI in the clinical and neurophysiological evaluation of patients with NIP. The clinical and neurophysiological patterns of 31 consecutive patients with NIP and variable degrees of disability were observed. Diagnosis was based on the clinical pattern, nerve conduction studies, quantitative sensory tests, electromyography and MRI. MRI findings were compared with those described by other authors in the literature. With the exception of two patients with a unilateral neuropathy and a concomitant central neurological disorder, the remaining 29 patients were affected by a symmetrical sensorimotor peripheral polyneuropathy. Thirty-one patients underwent MRI. The presence of small or large focal or asymmetrical lesions in the brain was noted in 20 patients (65.8%). The brain stem, the pons, the spinal cord and the cerebellum were mainly affected. It was observed the involvement of brainstem and the spinal cord in 8 and 10 patients, respectively. Seven cases showed alterations suggestive of a concomitant central nervous system disorder. MRI has a potential role in the early diagnosis of NIP, since it is a non-invasive, highly sensitive technique with a low cost. However, MRI findings need to be confirmed by experimental work. My brother Steve, his girlfriend Carole, and I sat with Dallas Cowboys Head Coach Tom Landry on a couch near a television while he was being interviewed. He had a reputation for being a straight shooter, so we were anxious to hear his assessment of the team. After about an hour of talking with him, it became clear that Coach Landry was still a rookie coach at age 65 6d1f23a050
