Original art prints from printmaker David Greenfield Tag Archives: The Year It's the 14th day of the 14th year of the present millennium! I've long felt a need for a 1000-year constant, for a year that repeats itself every 1,000 years. I've never heard of such a thing, but maybe I'm weird. I'd like to take some time to acknowledge the two and a half years of my life that came before this present era. I remember what it was like to live before dial-up Internet, before digital photography, before the advent of Photoshop. I miss the days of $18.99 home computers, such a luxury in the mid-1990s. It was a gradual switchover to being born into the world of digital photography and the web. Before digital, there was no way to tell the difference between a real photo and a computer-generated one. Most things you have and own in today's digital world were designed before we were born. If you aren't involved in the world of photography, you'd be surprised to know that DSLRs are the dominant choice of camera users. In a world dominated by easy-to-use, cost-effective software, it's hard to understand how many photographers still rely on the old-school, time-consuming exposure bracketing and other ways of working. Of course, we're not all fans of digital cameras. There's still a lot to be said for a real analog, manual-exposure camera. I would love it if every photographer owned a full-frame camera with an optical viewfinder and manual controls. But that's not realistic, as the cost of even high-end digital cameras is still under $1,000. I really miss the days when printing was something you had to order at Kinko's and wait to have your images in your hands. It seems like a nice little luxury to have a hand-printed photo and frame it without worrying about the cost and environmental concerns. Back to 2000.
