A: I guess it's to do with page rotation on your screen, or your screen resolution, and that's why it looks the same for you on all devices.

Broadcaster shows off Skype for television, in-stream video Android, iOS, Linux, Windows, Mac and web users can now view a show you can't tune out of WEBINAR:On-Demand Broadcaster The Weather Channel yesterday demonstrated how Skype is used to broadcast live into an ongoing cable program, to ensure that no viewers miss a moment of a news program. Skype now broadcasts a variety of video-streaming options, such as CNN, the Cartoon Network and The Weather Channel, and is also used to stream live baseball games. But the Skype for television utility is specifically designed to ensure that the user doesn't miss a moment in a particular television show, even if they're outside the broadcast area. "With the Weather Channel, you can't just tune into the weather channel," said Jason Delgado, product manager for Skype. "The Weather Channel is all about the weather, so if you're just tuning in at a particular time, you have to be ready to sit through that entire program." The Weather Channel broadcast enables the stream to be embedded in a web browser, so users can view the show from anywhere they have an internet connection. Anyone following live and ongoing programming, which is live into a cable channel, or the on-demand broadcast, which shows how a program played out, can use the Skype for television application. Users can also easily ask a question, comment on a topic or make a request of the presenter. Live broadcasts are a bit trickier. The Weather Channel broadcast was designed to be accessible. The live application was developed around a central location: the weatherman's desk. "There's this really comfortable setup for the news cast, and you really have to be to be prepared to be there all the time,” Delgado said. “It wasn’t written for multi-person” news sets. The application was also designed to work with broadcast television. Everything is broadcast via satellite and downlinked by one computer. “What you’re seeing is a computer talking to a satellite, and you’re not seeing a satellite talking to a computer, 6d1f23a050
