I have a list of values that need to be split over two columns, separated by one or more commas. I have tried the following: csvlist = [] for x in xrange(xrange(0,24500).count(",")): csvlist.append(str(x).split(",")) But the output is always 0, regardless of how many times the loop is run. A: You can use a list comprehension instead: csvlist = [str(x).split(",") for x in xrange(0,24500)] Or you can enumerate with the comma as delimiter: csvlist = [x for x in enumerate(xrange(0,24500), 1) if x[0] % 2] Both ways will give you a list with sublists that correspond to the number of separate items in each row. the wxPython forums, but I have only found posts on how to use SQLite with wxPython. I'm trying to create a list of options that the user can edit and then display the data as a table. An example would be giving the user a list of 6-10 countries, and then when they click on a given country, a table is created that lets them add the price of flights to that country. A: SQLite is supported out of the box. You only need to add the SQLite library to your project. Then it will work like any other database supported by Python. Q: Oracle 11g - data redundancy with remote servers We have a database backup that takes place every night at 2300. The backup contains the main database, DDL scripts, and DML scripts. The backup is a full database copy. I'm struggling with how to properly restore this backup to our test server so that we can rollback the same processes should there be an incident on our production servers and we need to test the rollback. My plan was to restore the backup to the test server, setup the test/dev servers to use the same log files and datafiles as the production servers. Then I would restore the production database to the production servers. So all of the DDL and DML scripts would be loaded into the test/6d1f23a050
