Sexual development and sex hormone function in fetuses and neonates. Human gonadal development begins as early as 14 days before the seventh week of gestation. Gonadal differentiation is regulated by gonadal steroids and a complex mix of other peptide and steroid hormones. Estrogens, in particular, play a role in the regulation of cell proliferation, differentiation, and apoptosis during fetal and neonatal gonadal development. These steroids may act directly on the fetal gonad and indirectly via the production of growth factors. This article reviews the physiology and pathophysiology of fetal and neonatal gonadal development and examines the impact of fetal and neonatal gonadal dysfunction, including sex chromosome abnormalities, thalassemia, and gonadal insufficiency. The goal of this review is to highlight the role of hormones in the physiological development of gonads and to raise physicians' awareness of the need for specialized endocrinology care for affected fetal and neonatal patients.
